- Anni's mother arranged for her to learn figure drawing with a tutor and then to study art in the traditional Impressionist style popular in Germany.
- Anni began to teach weaving, at Black Mountain College, North Carolina, and created wall coverings and drapery and upholstery materials while also making individual textiles to be regarded as independent artworks with no functional purpose
- In 1949, she moved to New York. Anni was the first woman and the first textile artist to have a solo exhibition at the Museum of Modern Art.
- Her woven works include many wall hangings, curtains and bedspreads, mounted "pictorial" images, and mass-produced yard material.
- She was known for her experimentation with colour, shape, scale and rhythm with abstract, crisscrossing geometric patterns
